The second book in the bestselling series about Jacob Juul.

In the first book, retired priest Jacob Juul unexpectedly becomes a widower, a grandfather, and a murderer within days—forcing him to dispose of a dead debt collector and outwit a criminal conspiracy, all while caring for his fearless granddaughter, Isabella.

Now, the parsonage is buzzing as Pastor Maria prepares to marry Gjertrud, but chaos looms. A naked, oil-slicked corpse appears upstairs, ruthless bandits wreak havoc, and the summer is the hottest in memory. Meanwhile, aging pastor Jacob Juul struggles with declining health as he hosts the wedding, aided by his determined granddaughter, Isabella. But with Maria's demanding mother stirring trouble and child services to convince, the celebration may not go as planned.

As in Jacob Juul's first novel, the style is sharp, action-driven, and laced with wit—like the undertaker recommending a closed coffin after a violent death: 'Some deaths it's best to keep a lid on.' Totland's characters take a pragmatic view of corpses, making this well-written, Tarantino- and Fargo-esque happy violence—light-footed and fun.

Stavanger Aftenblad

Refractory novel about a retired priest who becomes a murderer on page one. If you've seen the Cohen brothers' movie "Fargo," you might have an idea of the solution to the priest's problems. Recommended.

NRK. About A prayer for Jacob Juul

This is a humorous novel with clever dialogue, observations, and use of metaphors. It gives me associations to Arto Paasilinna's books, where hysterical and funny situations arise.
