A major disaster strikes the Russian industrial town of Nikel, close to the Norwegian border. A series of explosions at the industrial complex forces the population to flee, and the nearest safe haven is Kirkenes. Soon, the border is overwhelmed by frightened, exhausted and freezing Russian refugees.

Major Frank Halvorsen of the Norwegian Special Operations Command suspects that the disaster is not what it seems. In secret, he sends a team of his best operators, led by Lieutenant Ida Vinterdal, across the border to find out what is really happening.

Over the course of a few frantic days, relations between Norway and Russia deteriorate from businesslike to openly hostile. For the first time since the Cold War, armed conflict between the two neighbouring countries is no longer merely possible – but increasingly likely.

In a final, desperate attempt to prevent war, Ida Vinterdal and Frank Halvorsen take on a mission they are unlikely to survive.

This is quite simply the most thrilling and frightening thing I have read for years. Those of us who are familiar with Norwegian thrillers know that nobody depicts war, action and armed situations more intensely and realistically than Ørjan Nordhus Karlsson ...

Everything a classic thriller should be: dramatic, pushing the limits of credibility, yet gripping throughout – and with a thought-provoking undercurrent.
